RETINA uses fractal mathematics to study the complex branching patterns of retinal blood vessels. It measures global fractal dimension to describe overall vascular complexity and local fractal dimensions to examine how that complexity varies across retinal regions. These measurements are combined into a Microvascular Abnormality Index (MAI) to quantify structural differences between healthy and abnormal retinal networks.